. . . The only thing that stood between the Orcish invading army and the peaceful planet of Azeroth was the legendarily powerful king of the orc. . . Roshal. . . A. . . proud warrior of his people. But now, the day has come when even the mightiest warriors may be undone by the mightiest evil, and the hour of the War has come. It's time for Roshal to stand in the breach and face the greatest threat the world has ever seen. . . and to answer the call of war, the sacred chieftains of the Horde have issued the ultimate challenge: . . . Roshal must climb the tower of Tanaris, the holy of holies, and challenge the power of the Burning Legion itself. . . He must face his fears in the arena of Valithria, the kingdom of the Dark Lady. . . with the fate of his people at stake. A place of epic and terror. . . against the world. If he fails, the Horde will suffer an irrevocable and devastating defeat. . . and Roshal will be the betrayer of his own people. If he wins, though, there is no telling what might be unleashed in the world of Azeroth. . . A world transformed, forever. That's the world of Azeroth. . . Wow! The movie is out now? So finally, I got a chance to watch the movie. Though I really knew the movie was going to be released, but since I was at the wrong place when they released the teaser, I never got a chance to watch the movie at that time. After the teaser was released, I just started searching for the movie and got to know that it would be released on the same day as the teaser was released. So I was waiting for this movie at the theater. I got an advance copy of the movie. Though, since there was a small glitch in the preview and I had to wait for the advance copy to be replaced, I had to wait for the next morning to watch the movie. Also, since the movie was released that early, I watched a lot of movie trailers of other films. So it was a really great movie, though the movie was released way too early. As the movie came out, I started watching the 82157476af
